Dear Commission:

I have one important suggestions.

If you give additional time -- you should make available your public deliberation so that people will know why you made the decisions you did.

The first eight commissioners have reconvened the public meeting at which they will select the final six members of California's Citizens Redistricting Commission. Although we cannot predict just how long it may take the first eight commissioners to make this important decision, it is possible that they will decide on the final six members today. The first eight commissioners want to hear from as many interested persons as possible. As required by the open meeting law, they will take oral public comment at the open meeting before they take formal action by voting to select the final six commissioners. In addition, in order to provide even greater opportunity for interested persons who are not able to attend the public meeting in person, before the first eight commissioners vote on a proposed slate of the final six commissioners, the first eight commissioners will attempt to take a brief recess while the motion to select the final six members of the commission is pending. During that time, the names of those proposed for selection will appear on the livestream screen (see <http://www.wedrawthelines.ca.gov/>) and members of the public who wish to provide written comments may do so by sending an email to the votersfirstact@auditor.ca.gov account during the time period described on the screen. Please note that public comment on applicants has been open throughout the entirety of this application and selection process and this is just one more opportunity to provide public input.
