OK. What's the point here?

What can the communities of East County possibly have in common politically with the agricultural communities of Imperial County?

The answer is - nothing much. What we do have in common - a lot of horses and a few orchards - is not worth forming a political alliance over because it does not constitute our economic base here in East Co.

Ergo, we have much more in common with the Southwest corner of the state than we do with the Southeast corner. Which in short means don't mess with the present political districts.

Respectfully, Peter Nelson
